

CHAPTER 16 – FIELD NAMES

Field and local names are always a source of interest, speculation as to whence they came, as well as adding colour to any parish history. They often give a clue to the condition of a locality in bygone years, who may have owned a particular piece of land, or tell of some event which took place there. With Stapleford now possessing so few open spaces such names serve to remind us of much that was here so long ago. The following lists contain a wide range of these, although many are repeated with variations in spelling, and form a well which could be profitably drawn from to provide street and other names more fitting, apt and worthy of perpetuation than many in use today which have no connection with the parish either past or present.

Hill Field and Windmill Field

By taking Derby road and Nottingham road as a centre-line and intersecting it with Toton lane and Pasture road the parish can be roughly divided into quarters whereof the north-east was the Hill Field, so called in 1695, known as Hemlock Field in the very early 18th century and then reverting to its former name until it fell into disuse after the Enclosure Award. Out of this quarter must be subtracted the triangular area bounded by Pinfold lane, Nottingham road and Church street and which, at this time, formed a large part of the village.

The south-east quarter was the Clouds Field, as it was known in the 17th century (1666, 1673, 1682, 1695). By 1716 it had become the Windmill Field, for obvious reasons, but whether because perhaps Gervase Teverey's once stood there or because of one shown on later maps is not certain. Its present site is occupied by Revill's farm near unto which spot was a house known in the early 1820's (and later) as Niagara Cottage.

Niagara Cottage

This "cottage," - now long gone- was the home of a Captain William Sleigh who, although not a Stapleford man, chose to come and live here in the 1820's. He had joined the East and West Lothian Fencible Cavalry in 1798 and after serving in various theatres of war finally retired in 1828 at which time he was a Captain on half pay in the 99th Regiment of Foot. He had been wounded during his service in Egypt, and in Canada, at Cheppewa near Niagara Falls-which he must have seen-, hence the name for his house in Stapleford. As part of the village's celebrations in July 1838 for the coronation of Queen Victoria he entertained to tea some 40 widows and aged families. He died in 1842 aged 62 and his tombstone, a sarcophagus-like monolith supported on 4 sphinxes, stood opposite the south porch of the church until its destruction in 1952-53 when many gravestones were removed from their original sites. The four sphinxes long remained littered about the churchyard the subject of much speculation as to their original, until finally they too suffered an ignominious fate, the last and almost whole one being wantonly decapitated by a schoolgirl in the summer of 1973.

Bridge Field and land adjacent to the river

The south-west quarter was the Bridge Field, called variously Bridge-end Field, Brigg Field, Brigg-end Field, and before 1286 known as the South Field. To this division must be added a large portion of the meadows.

The fourth quarter, the north-west, comprised the remainder of the meadows, the Cunnery, the Hall and its immediate lands, that part of the village with its old enclosures west of Church street, and the Pastures; all of which had their own descriptive names. In the open fields were the furlongs, so called because anciently there were a “furrow-long”-that is 40 perches, by 4 perches wide, which, if measured by the king’s perch of 16 ½ feet, makes the size of a furlong exactly an acre. All very neat; but I don’t suppose for one minute that our furlongs were measured to such a nicety.

Just how many of these descriptive divisions there were in each field cannot be determined, and although many references described a piece of land as “on” or “in” such-and-such a place may be alluding to a furlong without precisely saying so, to assume such an intention could be most misleading.

Here is given the key to the lists following: - BF=Bridge Field. H=Hall lands. HF=Hill Field. M=Meadows. NK=Location not known. P=Pastures. V=Village proper. WF=Windmill Field.

The Roach

According to what has been handed down the Roach derives its name from “La Roche” or “Les Roches” -the Rocks. During the Napoleonic wars there were many French prisoners of war and a party of these was set to work widening the Stapleford end of Toton lane. The presence there of much rock was a good reason for them to allude to the site as “les roches” and this, following the Englishman’s custom of anglicising foreign words, became the “Roche” in speech and therefore spell it like the only similar English word that would be known to the local “Roach”.
